- Lake Titicaca is known as the little Switzerland of South America, and there is a floating island floating on the lake for hundreds of years. After breakfast, sail from the pier in Puno Bay, Puno, and arrive at ▲Uros Island in about 30 minutes. There are several reed houses and watchtowers on the island, and the island itself is made of reed grass and has a few bamboo branches stuck in the water to hold it in place, and the islanders who live on it still maintain the traditional Peruvian life.
- The islanders of Ulo often roam the waterways alone in small boats made of reeds called "totola", creating a unique appearance of Lake Titicaca. At present, there are about 40 floating islands in the lake, each island is not the same size, the small one lives about 10 people, and the big one has schools, post offices, shops, etc.! In Wuluo Island, we can understand how the islanders use reeds to build their houses and boats, and how they live on the reed floating islands, which is the most primitive way of life, and there is no modern power system and gas equipment. In addition, we can enjoy the beautiful scenery of the highest inland lake in South America, the clear sky, the turquoise water, the fresh air and quiet environment, as if walking into a dreamlike fairyland.
- Then head to the island of Taquire, where the most traditional communal community still remains, and you will need a lot of stamina to get to this island, as you will have to climb 200 meters at an altitude of 3,800 meters. But the landscape can only be described in four words: stunning! Here you can know what it is: blue sky and white clouds! Return to the pier in the evening!
